From a wider perspective, harassment and violence in campuses cannot be understood, confronted and solved if faculty and research teams, those who are in direct charge of the instruction day by day, are not a necessary part of the solution. This has to be comprehensive, taking campuses as a whole.

Guidance on Title IX has to include measures that acknowledge the reality day-by-day. Title XI has to be much greater in its scope, making sure that its preventions are matching the civil rights of the victims in the first place. A watchdog and a federal organ in DC working as a system on which to rely for the Prosecution of crimes in campuses would be an important mechanism. . What is the plan to rebuild the branches of specialists across the country after the Tech Bubble? What is next for career and credentialed faculty with potential to provide quality instruction along g) values of civic life that, at the end of the day, assist the learners in their future, particularly women? Faculty cannot be the scapegoats any more.

Hello:

I am Carmen Parron and I think that this is a great opportunity to provide insight, thank you for it.

First, from a wider perspective, harassment and violence in campuses cannot be understood, confronted and solved if faculty and research teams, those who are in direct charge of the instruction day by day, are not a necessary part of the solution. This has to be comprehensive, taking campuses as a whole.

Guidance on Title IX has to include measures that acknowledge the reality. Title XI has to be much greater in its scope, making sure that its preventions are matching the civil rights of the victims in the first place. A watchdog and a federal organ in DC working as a system on which to rely for the Prosecution of crimes in campuses would be an important mechanism. .

What is the plan to rebuild branches of specialists across the country after the Tech Bubble?

What is next for career and credentialed faculty with potential to provide quality instruction along g) values of civic life that, at the end of the day, assist the learners in their future, particularly women? Faculty cannot be used as scapegoats any more, particularly in the crisis of the education..

Thanks for your attention.
