Greetings!

I would like to add my comments to the issue, please.

I believe that any person, or people as a collective (a college, for example), has the right to believe what they choose to believe, and have the right to free speech. If the government allows funding for any such organization, it should not be dependent on what that organization's views are. Schools that have a religious conviction about anything they consider a moral issue have a right to express that perspective. They are not forcing it upon anyone. A student who chooses to go to a particular school understands that school's perspective. If they disagree, they are free to attend elsewhere.

I believe that most people in the USA do not want to see the government or a government agency force any school to change any beliefs, especially if they are based on traditional biblical values that have earned their place in our heritage.

Just because a small element of our society chooses to "orient" themselves to a particular role or gender identification does not negate the views of the vast majority of the rest of society.

I appreciate your consideration of this view.

MIKE SNAVELY
